We talk so much about the achievement gap and there is an absolute, real achievement gap. But what I focus on much more than that is what I call the opportunity gap. This is about providing students from every single background real opportunities to learn and to grow and to fulfill their tremendous potential. And in too many communities, you don't have access to the technology, you don't have access to the teachers who understand the technology, you don't have access to the out of school learning opportunities that other students have. And where you have great opportunity gaps, guess what?, that leads to the achievement gap. And so I'm a big believer in trying to make sure that every child, but particularly those children who come from historically disadvantaged communities or families or who haven't had these kind of chances. If we're serious about ending poverty, if we're serious about ending cycles of social failure, we have to provide children with great technology, with great teachers, and with a chance to learn and develop their skills in a way that their older brothers and sisters and parents have not had. We have to end those cycles. Too much of anything is too much, but I argue that school should be an oasis away from that I would argue is the wrong thing. And quite frankly, your children, your children grow up in a middle class community, in middle class families, often have access to whole sets of technology that disadvantaged children don't have. And I would argue that rather than schools being an oasis, schools need to be a place of opportunity. And when children don't grow up with two parents at home and, you know, three computers in the house and access to those kinds of things, that if we don't impact that earlier, the impacts of the digital divide are going to be huge for children who aren't quite as lucky as your children or my children. So, I don't think that schools should necessarily be an oasis away from this. In some places it has to be a place to catch up and to equalize opportunity. But I think a sense of balance, which is what you are aiming for, is important to all of us as parents, and to provide that sense of balance to our children. Yes, you don't want them sitting in front of a computer 18 hours a day. That's not healthy. I'd absolutely agree with that.
